Panelist had the chance to discuss the following questions;

Conversation: There are many reports stating that Africa is currently on the move. We can see the fast growth by new technology acquired by almost everywhere across Africa. Some countries such as Nigeria, Ghana, and Zimbabwe are constructing their own vehicles model. Ethiopia is one of the major airplanes operators in Africa. Ethiopia just acquired new generation of Airbus and became the first African airline to buy an airplane with over 300 seats. All these confirmed how Africa is on the move. What it takes to get more American businesses to want to explore business opportunities in Africa?

Conversation: Private sectors are important components of Africa development. They raise economic growth through investment, employment and business creation. They also contribute to knowledge transfer and many other benefits. To ensure that this growth will contribute to long term sustainability, private companies should include poor as producers, employees and consumers. In the long run, these poor trained will become the key partners in business. From there, both Africa, with a huge number of consumers and natural resources, and the US will have to make a real profit from each other. What are some of the business opportunities in US for the private sectors to get partnership?

Conversation: According to the African Development Bank, the private sector generates 70% of Africa's output, 70% of its investment and 90% of its employment. The long-term thinking - how can the African private sector maximize impact and advance pressing issues such as inclusive growth, human capital, critical infrastructure, regional competitiveness and environmental sustainability?

Conversation: According to Africa Investor, Development Finance Institutions (DFIs) have traditionally been cornerstone investors in African private equity and their investment makes approximately 9% of the overall private equity investment on the continent. Realizing the potential to contribute to sustainable development through investment in relevant sectors, such as infrastructure, agriculture and healthcare. How can governments, Development Finance Institutions (DFIs), Pension Funds and Sovereign Wealth Funds can work together to mobilize investments in sustainable initiatives and reduce costs of projects?

Conversation: In the next three to five years, Africa is expected to lose up to 60 percent of its talented engineers and technicians due to retirement, precisely at the time when it needs those skills to put in place the infrastructure and manufacturing needed for its transformation. This "paradox of the young" means we have to simultaneously address the job needs of the youth while keeping in place experienced people close to retirement. How can companies help unlock the potential of this demographic dividend?

Conversation: According to the IMF report, private capital inflows in Africa, both direct and portfolio investments, increased from $13.2 billion in 2003 to $48.3 billion in 2012. Demand for capital "" what could African policy-makers and exchanges do to encourage more listings and offer investors more opportunities?

The 2015 US-Africa Business Matchmaking Conference (UABMC) brought together business owners from Africa and the United States to discuss existing and potential opportunities in both markets. The event took place from November 19 - 21, 2015 at the Asian Resource Center in Austin-Texas.
